Again?

Melaxu leads you to an enormous, gnarled oak. She runs her hands over the bark of the old tree, as if looking for something. Her fingers are dark with some kind of herbal paste.

The nymph presses her hand against the oak and curls her fingers. She pushes inward, and something clicks. Satisfied, she turns her hand to the right, then pulls. You step back as out from the tree slides a perfect cylinder, but not of bark and wood. The cylinder is made of golden wheels and metal teeth, screws and ribbons, all in intricate motion. Melaxu stops the extraction, digging her feet into the turf to counteract the huge cylinder's inertia. The metal things keep twisting and sliding over and around one another.

"This," the philosopher declares as your reflection appears and breaks apart in the churning of the golden wheels, "is the Oricalchum. Sustained by the labor of the wicked gods and souls imprisoned in the Demoterion, it maintains all natural law and holds this maimed world together."

You watch the wheels turn, hypnotized, until Melaxu says, "This will take some time, but soon I will know exactly where the pirates are." The philosopher paces, keeping one eye on the glittering marvel, like a smith waiting for metal to cool before continuing her work.

- I try to be polite and diplomatic, though Melaxu can be prickly. "How long have you lived just outside of the village? And how did no one ever find you?"
- I want to learn what Melaxu knows. "How do you reach into a tree and not pull out a length of wood?"
- I let Melaxu work and spend time honing the edge of my sword.
